

Hello, I'm writing to report an orphaned work, in the form of software whose author (and sole owner) is no longer living. It's called Anagram, and the creator (Jerome T. Holland) died some time ago. As the website explains:

<http://www.parsifalsoft.com/>

There is nobody selling or supplying the product any longer. As such, the only way to get it -- and it's an exceptional product -- is "illegally" through someone who already has it.

I would prefer a world where software has no active owner can be freely distributed and modified, without fear of reprisal.

David Barrett